The Conversion of St Paul 24th January 2016

Practising spontaneity

There's a certain irony in struggling to write a reflection on spontaneity. Surely it should happen with effortless ease? I say struggle, but perhaps I mean something more playful. Words have always fascinated me and I enjoy how the same words are crafted differently in the hands of diverse writers such as Jan Morris, Alan Bennett and Flannery O'Connor. The priest is also charged with finding the right words and this is the charge of a lifetime. What words can be found to speak of the Word? I think it was D.H. Lawrence who spoke of 'poor talkative Christianity'. This probably explains why I've always been drawn to the contemplative traditions within the Christian faith. A spiritual seeker asks for a few words of wisdom from a venerable monk whose life was characterised by using as few words as possible. The response he received some may feel was a little terse: "If you are not edified by my silence, then I doubt you will be edified by my words."

Finding the right word then isn't as spontaneous as it may appear in the sense that the words themselves come from nowhere. I recall spontaneous decisions to invite a few friends to dinner at last minute and often these unplanned occasions can be great fun. It gives the impression that spontaneity just happens out of the blue and is unconnected to other events and conditions.

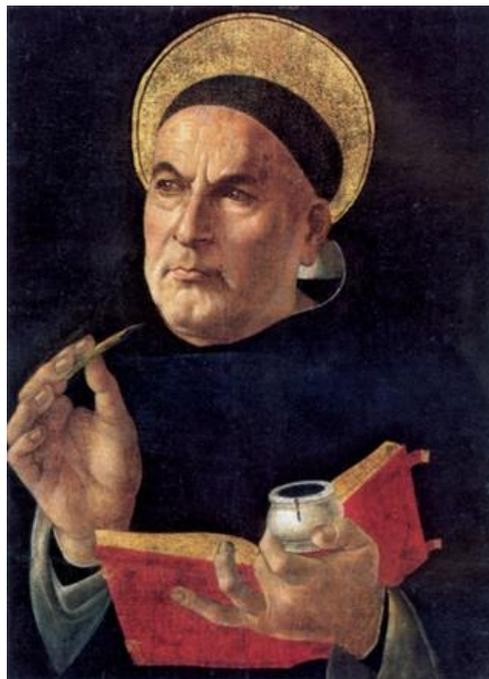

If the moral life is simply about making right and wrong choices, life becomes a tally of successes and failures. This is not something which fills my heart with joy. St Thomas of Aquinas, whose feast we celebrate this week, invites us to take a more holistic approach and think in terms of the movement of our whole life as a journey home to God from whom we have come. The virtuous life therefore is one in which we are strengthened for this journey: practising the virtues of courage, temperance, prudence and justice carry us on this journey and the theological virtues of hope, faith and love give us a glimpse of the fullness of life promised to us in baptism.

Many of you will know the story of Maximilian Kolbe who willingly 'owned up' to stealing some items of cutlery in the Nazi concentration camp where he was imprisoned, in the knowledge that by doing so the life of the culprit would be spared. It may appear that Kolbe acted spontaneously. In contrast to the fearful behaviour of the Nazi guards, his act alone was free. Words and action may appear to be spontaneous, but spontaneity needs to be practised. It may appear to be something random, but it is the glorious freedom to act in accordance with one's true nature, a person who lives out of the knowledge of the unconditional love of God.

CATHEDRAL STUDY SESSION

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE: FOR GOD SO LOVED THE WORLD – THE FOURTH GOSPEL with DAVID FORD

Saturday 20 February 2016 | 2 - 4.30pm

£15. The workshops will be at St Paul's Cathedral and details will be sent with bookings. Bursaries are available for those for whom the charge would make it difficult to attend. To book visit www.stpauls.co.uk

John's is the last of the Gospels, written after many decades of meditation. Often talked about as the most spiritual and poetic of the Gospels, it is also the most dramatic: almost all of it is vivid narrative about what Jesus does and says. And amongst all the action, John weaves theological commentary which challenges his first readers – and us – to engage with his revolutionary message about the nature of God: at the heart of his Gospel is the mind-blowing concept that the universe is centred on love.

David Ford is Regius Professor of Divinity at the University of Cambridge. He is writing a commentary on the Gospel of John, has given the 2015 Bampton Lectures at the University of Oxford on Daring Spirit: John's Gospel Now and is the author of The Drama of Living: Becoming Wise in the Spirit (Canterbury Press 2014).

The Ordo & Intercessions
