IT'S A LOTTERY...OR IS IT?!

"They proposed two, Joseph called Barsabbas, who was also known as Justus, and Matthias. Then they prayed and said, 'Lord, you know everyone's heart. Show us which one of these two you have chosen to take the place in this ministry and apostleship from which Judas turned aside to go to his own place.' And they cast lots for them, and the lot fell on Matthias; and he was added to the eleven apostles."

Tuesday is the Feast of St Matthias, the patron saint of alcoholics, carpenters and tailors and – most significantly – the man chosen to make up the number of the Twelve after the death of the traitor Judas. Although none of the Gospel accounts tells of his addition to the Twelve, the Acts of the Apostles does – and it describes the way in which he was elected: by lot.

Doesn't that strike you as an odd way to make such a significant appointment: a completely random choice? Perhaps, of course, there was nothing to choose between Justus and Matthias and so the casting of lots was the equivalent of tossing a coin to help to make an impossible choice. But why not say so? Coins were clearly in circulation: Jesus mentions them on several occasions! The casting of lots seems to suggest something more than a binary choice between two equal candidates. It suggests that there was a choice to be made, but that the responsibility for that choice was not exercised by rational human process. Nor, I suspect, is it implying that it was merely a matter of luck. Rather, the story suggests that in drawing lots, the choice was handed over to God.

But is that how our relationship with God works? Can we really just abdicate responsibility for making decisions and hand them over?

In the 20th century it became fashionable to play with the idea of 'chance' and 'randomness', not least in music and art. Some visual artists (Jackson Pollock inter alia) splattered paint at random and said the result was art. John Cage and Charles Ives were composers who explored the impact of indeterminacy in music: John Cage famously conceived of one 'piece' in which the audience just listened to random noise for 4 minutes and 33 seconds and were invited to consider it as a 'musical composition'; Charles Ives asked two brass bands to march toward each other from opposite ends of a town with the 'audience' standing in the middle, observing the resultant noise – and again invited the hearers to consider this randomness as a piece of music. Aleatoric theory is a step beyond this – inviting not randomness but complete chance into the equation ('alea' being the Latin for dice). Composers who have gone this step further include Boulez and Stockhausen, and in art, Miro and Dali.

What these approaches have in common is their fascination with what happens when human artifice cedes 'complete' control and embraces the vagaries of the unplanned and unintended. However, in none of them is the human input incidental or dispensable. What is essential to these approaches is the conjoining of artistic endeavour and randomness.

And what of this in our relationship with God? Is it right that we just give up and let God take the lead? It seems to me that the parallels are close. We are often at our best when we relinquish our death-dealing hold on things and embrace something of the apparent randomness of the world beyond ourselves. This feels like the realm of true creativity. God has, after all, created a wonderful world with which we are invited to connect and by which we are meant to be stimulated. But randomness is not God. Our ancient stories also tell us that God has created us with dignity and 'in his image' – so that our part in creativity is not incidental or dispensable, but is necessary. Just to 'park' our amazing (God-given) nature and to 'shake dice' or 'draw lots' when it comes to making decisions or being creative seems like a huge abdication of responsibility. We need to be part of decisions – and to shape them with the best endeavours that we can.

What do you need to let go of in your decision making in this week ahead? And what do you need to bring to the table? How will you exercise your authority responsibly?
